"Out of His Own Mouth," Etc.

It is difficult for a man who is not honest, and yet is constantly making professions of honesty, to be consistent.

There is always something crooked in his record.

Mr. Hendricks, the recently elected United States Senator from Indiana, is one of the unfortunates in this regard.

He is even so unfortunate as to expose his duplicity in a single speech.

Out of his own mouth let him be judged.

The Peace party make the President's Proclamation a pretext for their opposition to the Government.

But for this, Mr. Hendricks tells us, there would "not have been a dissentient voice in all the North."

Here are his words:

"I say to you, gentlemen, if the President of the United States, in the language of the Crittenden resolutions, had held up the banner of this country for the Constitution and a restored Union, that all the States shall remain under that Constitution, with every right secured and unimpaired, there would not have been a dissentient voice in all the North."

Mr. Crittenden's resolutions were adopted soon after the rebels commenced the war for the destruction of the Union and the Government.

There was but one voice against them in the House of Representatives. Eighteen months thereafter notice of the Emancipation Proclamation was issued.

Now, during the eighteen months, in which time the President used the army to protect the slaves' rebels, how did such men as Mr. Hendricks conduct themselves? The Enquirer says the "heart of the real Democrats of the country never was in the war."

Where was Mr. Hendricks' heart? Let him speak for himself. Regarding desertions, he said in his Shelbyville speech:

"I know that in some of your neighborhoods you are exasperated by seeing young men who have taken French leave from the army, taken back. They should not have done so. Before volunteering, they should have thought well of the matter. At that time I did not advise anybody to enlist, because I was not going myself, and I would not recommend any one to do a thing I would not do myself."

It appears then, that when men were called for to save the country; at the time, too, when Mr. Crittenden's resolutions, almost unanimously adopted by Congress, were fresh; and when there was no compromise to trouble the conscience of virtuous Democrats, Mr. Hendricks' heart was not in the war. He, by his own admission, did not advise anybody to enlist. Why? "I would not recommend any one to do a thing I would not do myself." That sounds brave, or candid, or something of that sort; but it is a very flimsy excuse; an apology so transparent that a man with half an eye can see through it. It is very plain that everybody could not, ought not, go to the war. Inasmuch as we had no slaves to work for the support of armies in the field, or families at home, it was necessary to keep a large proportion of our white population to sustain those who did go to the war. It is possible that Mr. Hendricks might have been more valuable to his country at home than in the field. If so, his place was at home. But this would not preclude him from aiding his country in its day of peril, by his influence. The reason he offers, therefore, for not advising "anybody to enlist," is not the reason. Neither is his present opposition caused by the President's proclamation. It is plain, from the fact that his influence from the start has been against the Government, that his heart has never been in the war; and it is equally plain that his heart, from the beginning, has been in the rebellion. He stands now, precisely where he stood when the Crittenden resolutions were adopted. He was too cowardly to avow his true sentiments then, and he is not honest enough now to give the true reason for his present position. If he told the truth he could not make party capital, but by howling Abolitionism, and appealing to prejudices, and exciting the passions of the people, he can, or thinks he can, make party capital, and therefore howls, appeals, misrepresents and acts out the part of a shrewd and designing demagogue. Out of his own mouth we have proved him dishonest and disloyal.
